The study was based on in situ research and inventory of the collection's objects, the state of preservation of artifacts, the methodological control and measurements, the building and inner exhibit and storage spaces on the condition of a series of interviews, which include detailed questionnaire, with the museum's staff and on researching the Museum's archival materials along with the related bibliography. The study focused on the specific environmental condition in which the Museum's collection are stored and displayed, the Museum's working weaknesses, the specific architectural and design problems, as well as suggestions for technical improvements that will affect the future operation and viability of the Museum.